Free dumping offered by county

Just in time for spring cleanup, Crittenden County will offer free dumping next week at its convenience center off U.S. 60 East. The program will see the disposal center open 8 a.m. to 4 p.m. April 17 and 18, according to Solid Waste Coordinator Sue Padgett. Large items, including furniture and appliances, will be accepted, but tires will not be taken. Disposal of household garbage will still require a fee.

MPD has opening for new patrolman

Marion Police Department has an opening for a patrolman following the resignation last Wednesday of police veteran Jerry Parker. Police Chief Ray O'Neal said Parker resigned in good standing after seven years with the department. MPD currently has five officers — Bobby West, Heath Martin, George Foster, Robert Harris and Chief O'Neal.

Paul tosses hat in presidential ring

U.S. Sen. Rand Paul of Kentucky is now ready to test how much change voters want, both for their government and for the GOP. The tea party favorite and frequent antagonist of leaders of his Republican Party began his White House campaign Tuesday, kicking off the run with a rally in downtown Louisville. He was then left for early nominating states with a pitch aimed at the libertarian corners of the GOP. Paul, whose father Ron has run unsuccessfully for president three times, begins the 2016 race as the second fully declared candidate, behind Sen. Ted Cruz of Texas. But he could face as many as 20 rivals for the nomination before the lead-off Iowa caucuses early next year.

CCHS teens accepted to new math, science academy

By JASON TRAVIS
STAFF WRITER

Two Crittenden County High School students have been selected to join the inaugural class of the prestigious Craft Academy for Excellence in Science and Mathematics. Kaitlyn Gayle Wheeler, the daughter of Bill and Kory Wheeler of Marion, and Audrey Lee Smith, the daughter of Chris and Stephanie Smith of Fredonia, are two of 60 students representing 36 counties in Kentucky selected to be part of the Craft Academy's Class of 2017. The academy will open in August on the campus of Morehead State University in Morehead, Ky. The Craft Academy was created during the 2015 General Assembly as a line item to allow exceptional high school juniors and seniors across the Commonwealth to attend a boarding school-type academy on the Morehead campus. House Bill 232 authorizes the Craft Academy to issue state scholarships and high school diplomas. It will provide college-level curriculum that allows students to finish high school while also completing up to two years of university coursework. In addition, students have the opportunity to participate in their local high school graduation as well as the Academy graduation.

In his remarks last month during the signing ceremony to finalize legislation that created the academy, Kentucky Gov. Steve Beshear said much like the Gatton Academy, which is located on the Western Kentucky University campus, the Craft Academy provides another tool for the state in preparing its future leaders. On March 30, both Wheeler and Smith received their class schedules for the fall semester during the academy's orientation day. For Wheeler, attending the Craft Academy means gaining additional rigor in her educational experience. Her first semester will focus on mathematics and psychology. However, she wants to explore all the various educa-

Crittenden Health Systems Auxiliary at any given time has hundreds of donated books for sale to patrons of the hospital for only a quarter each. Not only do the books help those in waiting rooms and patients convalescing pass time, they generate money that goes into improvements at the hospital. Pictured above (from left), Barbara Riley, Muriel Hughes and Melva Harris display their carts filled with dozens of books of just about every genre.

Auxiliary books fund CHS projects

It's not the library, but the hospital is a place where time can be passed more gently with lines of a book. Whether it is in the waiting room or convalescing in a bed, local hospital patrons are fortunate to have a seemingly endless supply of reading material available in the lobby. Crittenden Health Systems'

Auxiliary sells books for a mere quarter each. "Twenty-five cents isn't too much for anyone," said Muriel Hughes, one of the ladies in pink who manages the hospital foyer and gift shop. Donors give the books to the auxiliary, which turns the profit into bedding, mattresses, chairs for the waiting room and even some remodeling projects at the health care facility. "It's the best money maker we've ever had," said auxiliary member Melva Harris. The ladies accept used books from anyone, and they're not particular about the genre. However, Harris said love-inspired books seem to move the quickest. "When people get through

CCES enacts nut-restricted food policy

It's a lunch-time staple for many American families with children, but a peanut butter and jelly sandwich can be a serious health risk to a growing number of people, particularly the youngest segment of the nation's population. That's why the local school district has enacted a peanut/nut-restricted policy at Crittenden County Elementary School. The restrictions are campus-wide and started

Corey Crider doesn't perform close to home very often. Usually he's performing in faraway cities like Chicago. Currently, he is in Texas rehearsing for Amarillo Opera's upcoming production of "Les Miserables." But this month, for one night only, Crider will perform at Paducah's Carson Center, where he'll have the opportunity to showcase his vocal talent fewer than 50 miles from his hometown. The Marion native will be a guest soloist April 18 as the Paducah Symphony Orchestra

Rural hospitals' future appears bleak without community support

Lindell and Pauline Dolan owned and operated a small country grocery store until the late 1970s in rural western Tennessee where I grew up. It was a thriving business for many years, serving customers from a fairly broad area. However, when Walmart opened 8 miles up the road in the county seat, their business was inevitably crippled. Dolan's Grocery pumped gas, sold feed, milk, bread, cold drinks, canned goods and a variety of in-season fresh vegetables. There was a wood-burning stove and a church pew in the back of the store where men from around the community would huddle to play checkers and smoke cigars. In many ways, that little country store was the center of the community. I will never forget the day the auction company showed up to sell everything. It was my grandparents' store. My disheartenment was real even for a young boy. There to help pack boxes and load cars as the auction ended, I recall the sadness that filled those who came to buy and simply observe the final chapter of a community icon. It was a depressing day, yet fond memories remain of the times when I thought the entire candy section belonged to me. Change can be wonderful, inevitable and, yet, equally painful. As I watch our state and country's health care system move into the dawn of a new era under the Affordable Care Act, I wonder just how affordable — and how accessible — treatment will be in the coming years, especially for rural folks. I have a feeling that this change will be of the painful variety. Rural hospitals like the one in Marion serve almost half of Kentucky's entire population. Like the hospital here, most of them in small communities serve a large number of uninsured, poor and aged citizens. When we lost little country grocery stores, it was not because they failed as viable businesses; it was because the folks in the neighborhood started driving past them en route to the large discount department stores that popped up in town. When people forsook Dolan's Grocery in order to save less than two bits on a gallon of milk, they lost more than they ever bargained for. And we lost part of Americana. We've seen the same right here. When I first came to Crittenden County, there were country groceries in Dy-cusburg, Mattoon, Tolu and Sheridan. They are all gone, and that bit of our culture will never be recaptured. Our rural hospitals are headed down the same path of extinction unless we recognize and reverse the trend. "We were all surprised when the little country stores closed, but it was our fault," said Charlie Hunt, who is chairman of the volunteer board of directors that oversees management of Crittenden Health Systems, our local hospital and affiliated services. "The only way for rural hospitals to survive is through community support," Hunt says with the luxury of hindsight and a distinct understanding of what's in store for the future. I have talked with Hunt, hospital CEO Greg McNeil and other administrators and health care workers in the last few weeks since the facility held its annual business meeting and unveiled its somewhat optimistic, yet very tenuous financial condition. Last week's report from State Auditor Adam Edelen backs up the discussions we've been having here — and in every small hamlet between Fulton and the Cumberland Gap. Our rural health care is

Community leaders at Tuesday signing of a document proclaiming April as Child Abuse Prevention Month in Crittenden County are (from left) Robin Curnel, Staci Blackburn, Julie Brooks, Community Educator Holly White, Crittenden County Schools Superintendent Vince Clark, Family Court Judge Brandi Rogers and Newcom (seated).

Officials team together to raise child abuse awareness

STAFF REPORT

Raising awareness on a sensitive but important issue, that's the goal of local leaders who joined Crittenden County Judge-Executive Perry Newcom Tuesday afternoon during a signing ceremony proclaiming April Child Abuse Prevention Month in Crittenden County.

Officials are bringing awareness to the matter by hosting a variety of events this month, including Wear Blue Day on April 24. In addition, pinwheels, which symbolize child abuse prevention awareness, will be placed along school grounds and other locations within the community.

In the proclamation, Newcom urges all citizens, community agencies, faith groups, medical facilities and businesses to increase their participation in efforts to support families, thereby preventing child abuse and strengthening the community.

Child abuse is considered to be one of the nation's most serious public health problems. Scientific studies link the abuse and neglect of children with a wide range of medical, emotional, psychological and behavior disorders.

Officials want to demonstrate the importance of families and communities working together to stop child abuse.

NEWS BRIEFS

Juvenile suspected in county shooting

A Crittenden County juvenile has been charged with felony wanton endangerment for allegedly firing multiple rounds from a handgun in the vicinity of another person driving an ATV.

Crittenden County Sheriff's Department is investigating the incident which is believed to have occurred on March 29 on Blackford Church Road in rural Crittenden County.

Although no names have been released because the case involves a juvenile suspect, local authorities say the court is considering certifying the 17-year-old male as an adult due to the seriousness of the alleged crime.

No one was injured, according to the sheriff's office.

The suspect was apparently in the driver's side of a moving vehicle and there was an ATV with one person on board following behind the vehicle. Shots were allegedly fired from the passenger side of the vehicle.

No other information was available from public records, because of the juvenile's involvement. At this time, there have been no charges filed against the unnamed driver of the vehicle.

Local law enforcement has arrested a man who was identified through DNA left behind at a crime scene.

Crittenden County Sheriff's Deputy Don Perry arrested

Louisville resident Brandon Jagers, 33, after officials say he stole property from a Jefferson County residence, including firearms. He was an inmate at Crittenden County Detention Center when Perry issued the arrest warrant.

Brandon Jagers, 33, is accused of stealing the property from the home on May 15, 2013, according to an official police warrant.

Official records say Jagers dropped a cigarette while he was inside the residence. Investigators collected the cigarette and had it sent to a Kentucky State Police lab for analysis. Authorities say Jagers was "positively identified through DNA profile."

Police have charged Jagers with one count of burglary. He remains lodged in Crittenden County Kentucky Attorney General Jack Conway said someone claiming to be a representative from the IRS who is threatening to take legal action is a strong indicator that it's not really the IRS. Additionally, when the IRS first contacts a taxpayer, they do so via mail, not by phone.

Callers may also demand payment via a prepaid debit card or wire transfer; however, the IRS doesn't ask for either of these payment methods, nor will they ask for credit card numbers.

Don't provide any account or other personal information, Conway warns. Simply hang up the phone.

IRS scam making rounds again locally

Area residents are warned to protect themselves from fraud and be vigilant of phone scams claiming to be associated with the IRS.

Recently, several people have reported they have been contacted by scammers identifying themselves as IRS representatives. The scammers are telling victims they owe money to the IRS. These scammers have also left voice messages stating that the victim must take care of a "time-sensitive matter" and return the call, or the IRS will take legal action against the victim.

Minor quake felt felt last Wednesday

There was a rumbling both above and below the ground in the area last week.

As thunderstorms rolled across the tri-state region after dark last Wednesday, a 3.6 magnitude earthquake struck the New Madrid Fault Zone. According to the U.S. Geological Survey, the tremor occurred at 10:51 p.m. in the bootheel of Missouri near Steele. The USGS originally labeled the shaking a 4.0 magnitude, but downgraded the measurement.

People from western Kentucky, southern Illinois and northwest Tennessee felt the tremor. There were no reports of damage or injuries.

Monday with school officials monitoring students' lunches for peanut- or nut-containing products. Parents were notified of the new policy in a letter sent home with students on March 27, before spring break.

The need for a restricted policy was first explored after parents of multiple students with allergies to peanuts and tree nuts expressed their concerns before the school-based decision making (SBDM) council about the elementary school's doctrine toward the growing and dangerous food allergen. That was almost two years ago, according to CCES Principal Melissa Tabor.

"We have been researching this for a year and a half," she said of implementing the peanut/nut-restricted policy.

"We had a wellness committee overseeing this, researching about 20 other school districts that have done this."

The decision was made at the SBDM-level to establish the new policy. The council includes Tabor and teacher and parent representatives.

Tabor said there are at least five students at the school with proven nut allergies, which can bring on severe rashes, swelling and life-threatening breathing difficulties. Even small amounts of allergens can create serious problems, and nuts do not have to be ingested to do so. Skin contact, even inhalation of allergen molecules can cue a reaction.

Because of the possibility of cross-contamination, a campus-wide, comprehensive avoidance of foods containing nuts was deemed to be the best solution to reduce the health risks to students with allergens, Tabor indicated.

Crittenden County School District Superintendent Vince Clark said he supports the action taken at the elementary school, despite the argument that the policy can be a burden on parents when it comes to packing lunches for finicky eaters who may rely on PB&J sandwiches and snack crackers containing peanut butter to get them through the day.

"There are valid points on each side of the issue," he said. "Ultimately, we have to support efforts to offer a safer learning environment for the children."

Tabor emphasized that students who bring peanut or nut products to school will not be punished or isolated. She said two cafeteria tables are available for each class, with one designated as nut-free.

Peanut and tree nut allergies plague an estimated 19 million Americans.

Education soon minus Hodges

By JASON TRAVIS
STAFF WRITER

It was in the early 1980s when Crittenden County High School received an invitation from KET to have its students participate in a television program called the Scholastic Challenge. A team was soon chosen to compete in the academic quiz bowl, and leading the students to the tournament was CCHS math teacher Mary Helen Hodges.

Also participating in the academic tournament was a team from Caldwell County High School. Hodges, now retired from education, said teachers and students in the area enjoyed the experience so much, they soon began competing in academic team meets with other high schools in the region.

That's how academic team competition was born in western Kentucky. It soon would spread across the state, from west to east, extending into Frankfort, Louisville and Lexington.

"We organized it here in the west, and it caught on at the state level," Hodges said.

She said it was a great opportunity for Crittenden County students to travel, compete and meet students from other schools. It also provided students not involved in other activities, such as sports, an opportunity to compete with an organized team and develop a sense of camaraderie.

Hodges was the first academic team coach at CCHS, coaching the team from 1982 to 1989. During that time, the teams won many tournaments from the district to state level. In 1986, Gov. Martha Layne Collins bestowed the title of Kentucky Colonel to Hodges for her efforts in establishing academic team competition in the state.

A Kentucky Colonel is the highest title of honor bestowed by the Commonwealth and the designation is given in recognition of noteworthy or outstanding service for accomplishments at the community, state or national level.

Hodges believes academic team competitions are an important part of education by providing an avenue for students to study, learn and to be proud of what they know and can accomplish.

Hodges began her teaching career in 1972. She taught special education at the elementary school level for one year at Fohs Hall. She spent the rest of her teaching career at CCHS teaching math to mostly juniors and seniors. She also taught evening math classes for Madisonville Community College for 17 years.

A graduate of Murray State University, Hodges received a bachelor's degree in mathematics and special education and a master's degree in elementary education.

Hodges wasn't the first educator in her family. Her grandmother taught at Pleasant Grove Elementary School and was seen as a role model for Hodges, who knew she wanted to become a math teacher even before beginning elementary school.

Another role model was her father, Franklin Stalion, who was valedictorian of his Salem High School graduating class. Inspired by him, Hodges attained the same honor and was named valedictorian of her high school graduating class in Livingston County.

Hodges said some of the best advice she received as a teacher came from the late Bruce Moore, who was an assistant principal at CCHS. Hodges said he encouraged her not to give too much homework. He reasoned that giving 10 carefully selected math equations for homework assignments that were examples of what students needed to learn was just as effective as giving 20 or 30 equations. His reasoning also aided teachers, because it cut down on paperwork.

"I always remembered that and thought how correct he was," Hodges said. "I carefully chose the problems I would give for homework assignments. That made students enjoy it more because they knew they weren't going to be loaded down every night with homework. It also kept the students' morale up."

Noting how classroom equipment changed since she first began her teaching career, Hodges said she didn't start out with whiteboards and markers, but rather with chalk, chalkboards and erasers.

Technology was also modest. She recalls the time it took to manually figure the averages for more than 100 students for a nine-week grading period.

"I had to figure all my students' grades by hand and perform long division to get the average," Hodges said. "In 1975, I got my first calculator. It was a Texas Instruments. All it did was add, subtract, multiply and divide, and it was $37.50. Now, you can buy the same thing for $5 or less."

By contrast, before she retired, she was figuring her students' grades by computer.

Also, in her early years of teaching, when students requested letters of recommendation for college, Hodges used a typewriter, not a computer and printer to generate the letters.

Looking back, she said she is glad to have been able to teach during both eras of technology.

In 2000, Hodges retired from CCHS. But her career in education was about to take a new turn.

She worked for the National Faculty, a hand-picked group of teachers, administrators, coaches, authors and experts who conduct professional development activities in order to improve 21st century teaching and learning.

Hodges also oversaw the math professional development grant in Livingston County from 2000 to 2001. As a graduate of Livingston Central High School, she appreciated the opportunity to work with former classmates who had become educators in the district.

Then, to help fill a vacancy, she taught math at LCHS for a year before returning to Crittenden County as a substitute teacher.

In 2005, she led a grant project through the Teacher Quality Institute at Murray State University to write units of study for Algebra I for 13 counties in western Kentucky.

Currently, she is the regional coordinator for mathematics intervention at the Kentucky Center for Mathematics based out of Northern Kentucky University. As regional coordinator, her role is to visit classrooms and provide support to teachers and talk about the best ways to help children learn a good foundation in mathematics. She travels across the state conducting workshops for preschool and kindergarten teachers as well.

In her workshops, Hodges emphasizes research conducted in 2007 that indicated early success with mathematics is the greatest predictor of later achievement in school. She believes teachers need to devote a significant amount of time to teaching math and alludes to additional studies that suggest students who develop an early, strong foundation in mathematics perform better in other subject areas since math involves reasoning and thinking skills that are helpful in other subjects.

"Teachers are teaching math in new ways, and the children are learning faster," Hodges said. "We've learned just memorization is not the key. The key is a good, solid foundation of understanding how and why the numbers work together."

At the end of June, Hodges will officially retire after 43 years in education.

During her career, she's received the Who's Who Among American Teachers Award. In 2010, she received the Mathematics Education Service and Achievement Award given by the Kentucky Council of Teachers of Mathematics.

Her advice for new teachers beginning their educational careers is to demonstrate an even temperament and to enjoy their profession.

"If you're having a bad day, don't let the students know it. Put on your happy face and enjoy your career and enjoy your students," she said.

As for her plans after education, Hodges and her husband, Reg, are planning to leave their long-time home of Marion in July and relocate to Daytona Beach, Fla.

"We will miss our family and friends, but it will be exciting to start a new adventure and a new chapter in our lives," she said.

(Editor's note: The Crittenden Press will throughout the year bring you stories on many of Crittenden County's retired teachers.)

have to be grateful. Now, it's up to us to keep the ship righted.

Hunt, who chairs the board, said about 10 percent of the future of this hospital rests in the hands of its leaders. The other 90 percent falls squarely on the shoulders of this community.

Use it, or lose it. That's the simple message.

You can't imagine how much I miss having a bologna sandwich with Teddy Dalton at the Tolu Grocery or some of the local cowboys at Mattoon. My grandparents are long since deceased, so there is no going back to Dolan's Grocery, but it's a shame that part of our culture is completely gone.

What will be terribly disheartening and maybe even life-threatening is if our local hospital dries up while we're driving past it.

in Trouble, with a capital T.

Health care is a very complicated and broad subject. The terms and conditions in which hospitals operate today are almost cryptic to the average American. Few of us understand how these institutions bill us, much less how they make ends meet in a climate of major change that nips at the heels of their very existence. It's grossly tragic in many ways because as new laws go into effect, there's more and more downward pressure on these small hospitals. It's almost like there is a supreme power somewhere that wants to see these first lines of health care erased from the countryside.

In a purely business sense, county hospitals do not have a good record for making money, or breaking even for that matter. The state auditor's report found that nearly one-quarter of Kentucky's 66 rural hospitals are in danger of closing.

A variety of financial factors wouldn't make them attractive to investors, to say the least. They're generally not as efficient as larger-volume health care facilities and their expensive high-tech equipment gets far less use than equal technology at metropolitan sites. One would imagine that more resources are required to recruit and keep physicians in places like Marion than perhaps Louisville or Nashville, Tenn.

The deck is stacked against small facilities like CHS. Washington nearly wiped out rural hospitals when it started meddling with health care in the early 1980s. Nearly 500 were forced to closed before some changes were made in the late 1990s.

Hospitals in Livingston, Union and Caldwell counties each received critical-care designations during the tumultuous earlier times and those stripes are serving them very well right now. Simply stated, the government makes sure their entitlement payments are roughly equal to costs. That's what happens in our border counties.

Meanwhile, Crittenden's hospital operates toe-to-toe with much larger health care facilities like those in nearby Paducah, Hopkinsville and Madisonville. Crittenden Health Systems is a long-term, acute-care facility just like the bigger boys. When Medicare and Medicaid patients are served in Marion, Uncle Sam pays the hospital much less for the same procedures that patients would get at other nearby county hospitals under the critical-care designation. Remember, it's an odd and convoluted system.

When most of your customers are Medicare and Medicaid subscribers – with that segment making up 85 percent of your receipts – you're losing anywhere from 7 to 15 percent on every job you do.

Based on the ramifications of Obamacare, it looks like America is headed toward a single-payer health care system much like the United Kingdom and Canada. When that happens, Uncle Sam's wallet will be paying not 85 percent of Crittenden Hospital's services, but 100 percent. When that happens, hospitals will have to play solely by government rules or get completely out of the game.

Right now, hospitals are leaving the table based on what is occurring and what is sure to happen down the road. A hospital in our sister community – Crittenden County, Ark. – closed about a year ago.

More than 50 rural hospitals have been shuttered in the last few years across the U.S., most of them in the rural South.

So what are we left to do? The local hospital's current administration and board of directors appear to have gotten control of a ship that was perhaps headed into unforgiving waters just a few months ago. For that, we
