Diane Follingstad, Ph.D., has been an integral part of the Center for Research on Violence Against Women (CRVAW). In this role, she has been dedicated to advancing understanding of violence against women and advocating for the rights of survivors. Her commitment to this field has been recognized by the University of Kentucky (UK) faculty, where she holds a position as Professor in the Department of Biostatistics.

Follingstad's research focus is on understanding violence against women, and her work has been recognized through her involvement with the Student Textbook and Academic Authors Association as one of seven in the region. Her recent efforts have been directed towards understanding which violence is most updated information.

The CRVAW has provided a platform for Follingstad's research, with the Center's impact felt in various capacities. The Center's research has been guided by the UK administration, which decided against students returning to campus immediately following their Spring Break. Additionally, the shelter's farm project was initiated by the UK administration, with the aim of providing insights into this important issue.

In her role as a CRVAW Faculty Dr., Follingstad has been instrumental in shaping public health initiatives focused on prevention through changing attitudes and consequences of violence against women. Her work has also been recognized by the University of South Carolina, where she holds a secondary appointment.

Follingstad's research has been supported by a variety of organizations, including the CDC funded U01CE002668 project, named multi. She is currently the co-chair for a project that is focused on understanding which violence is the most updated information.

Follingstad's contributions to the field of violence against women have been recognized through her involvement with the University of Kentucky. She has received a College of Public Health visiting professorship, and her work continues to be supported by the UK administration.

In the future, Follingstad hopes to see the CRVAW continue its efforts to promote violence prevention and advocacy. The Center's impact is expected to continue to grow as Follingstad and others continue their work towards understanding and addressing violence against women.